BOSTON. ADDRESS. COPLEY SQUARE

"Copley Square is the junction of Boylston, Dartmouth and Blagdon (sic - Blagden?) Streets and Huntington and St. James Avenue. Originally known as Art Square, as the original Museum of Fine Arts faced the square, it was renamed Copley Square on February 21, 1883, in honor of John Singleton Copley, a noted painter who once lived on Beacon Hill. Today, the McKim Building of the Boston Public Library dominates the square. In this photograph of 1905, the Museum of Fine Arts can be seen on the left and the S.S. Pierce & Company Store, designed by Edwin S. Tobey, is in the center." p.101 etc. (old photos)

"Copley Square, in Boston, is just now greatly attracting the attention of those interested in municipal improvement. Although, like nearly all the Boston 'squares,' it is at present really a compound polygon, it is distinguished by being traversed by three important streets, through each of wich many thousands of people are transported every day by several lines of electric cards; and it is impossible to doubt that, before many years, it will become a very important business centre, -- probably the most important in the city, next to the area about the intersection of State and Congress Streets. The present condition of the square, as an object of artistic interest, is simply lamentable. Two

"Copley Square with its superb churches, museums, library, and colleges is regarded by the Bostonians with a Florentine or Athenian civic pride, and bears the name of our greatest old time artist. The foremost architects have prepared competitive plans for its appropriate adornment, which will probably be in the form of a dainty sunken garden with shrubbery, fountains and statuary.
